

CONCLUSION

“We may not be able to prepare the future for our children, but we can at least prepare our children for the future” (President Franklin D. Roosevelt).

It reveals that, since India achieved independence, she has taken a range of proactive steps by the three organs of the government that is legislature, executive and judiciary to put in place an exhaustive legal and policy structure to safeguard children's rights, in order to guarantee their survival, growth, security and participation. A number of new plans, programs and schemes have been formulated for addressing issues relating to children. While the government has made a great deal on the front of legislation to curb many social evils against children it is important how these are to be implemented in the ground to protect children. Children need guidance and assistance. The techniques of life are unknown to them. Individuals like us have to take their hand and show them the right way. Thus, we can see that in the best interests of its young citizens the Indian Legal System has indeed made separate provisions. From the above discussion it may be concluded that there are numbers of legislations formulated in India but those are meaningful in their level of implementation.
